The new NHL has been plagued by bad decisions, bad calls and broken rules throughout the season. Luckily, most of the on ice decisions have been fairly straightforward so far. But with the playoffs looming, the refereeing is starting to get a little dicey. We take a look at four recent bad refereeing decisions that have affected the final outcome of the game. 4 – Colin Campbell Referee Trouncing What happened: When Anton Lander skated into the corner near the Nashville bench, the Predators' Colin Campbell came in after the whistle blew to clean the puck up. So there's a couple of weird things here. First off, Campbell is not listed as a "goal judge" in the NHL rulebook and doesn't have any additional responsibilities per se. Secondly, how in the world is Campbell allowed to initiate contact while the whistle is still blowing? It doesn't matter who initiated the contact. Campbell was out of position and making a brutal trip of a player who was clearly in trouble. The fact that Campbell initiated contact means absolutely nothing. Since Campbell is not a "goal judge" his only options were to toss the puck clear or leave the play. All of this information and more was right there on the NHL match officials website. The NHL has seen a lot of these types of questionable refereeing decisions in the first few games. However, the league usually says that they are simply making their line up, so they can see the rulebook. In this case, however, we actually see Colin Campbell holding a copy of the rulebook and looking up the rule as Campbell is violating it. Making matters even worse, Lander felt the full force of Campbell's forearm on his knee. Apparently, the physical pain wasn't enough because Lander skated straight back out on the ice, never letting the referee know what just happened. Unfortunately, that's all Lander had to show for his bad luck, as the linesman has a clear view and picked up the puck in time. What we're saying: It doesn't matter who was
